Stepping Stones Museum for Children shoots a game-changing shot for local children by getting an assist from a legendary UConn basketball player.

During “An Evening with Rebecca Lobo” on May 17, local hoops fans have the rare chance to meet the women’s basketball icon while helping to support the museum’s summer learning programs.

This memorable evening with Basketball Hall of Famer Rebecca Lobo will fund programs such as Camp ELLI, which provides children from underserved backgrounds with little to no formal preschool learning a literacy and language-rich summer filled with fun learning experiences that will prepare them for kindergarten in the fall.

“These children often face greater challenges and require more resources to support their development,” said Rhonda Kiest, president of Stepping Stones. “Therefore, Stepping Stones aims to fully fund 200 scholarships so children in need can attend this program.”

Lobo’s inspiring message will include:

- The importance of teamwork – anecdotes from her life and career
- The importance of balancing academics and sports

- Academics – the importance of preschool education
- Summer programs – the impact of summer learning to prevent “summer slide”

Rebecca Lobo is currently a women’s basketball analyst for ESPN. She has met presidents, flown on Air Force One, played Sesame Street’s Big Bird, acted on network sitcoms, and chatted on the famed couches of David Letterman and Conan O’Brien.

In 1995, she was the transcendent star of UConn’s first women’s basketball national championship team. The next year, she was the youngest member of the gold medal-winning U.S. Olympic team at the Atlanta games.

In 1997, Lobo was one of the original 16 players signed to the WNBA. Following a successful all-star career with the New York Liberty, she was immortalized as an inaugural member of the team’s Ring of Honor.

However, her athletic accolades didn’t end there. In 2010, Lobo was inducted into the Women’s Basketball Hall of Fame.
